

GLOOM SETTLES
ON MORTENSENFears He Is Abandoned by Wife and Friends.

IS CHANGED IN HIS MANNER

INDICATIONS THAT PRISONER IS SUFFERING MENTAL DISTRESS.

Peter Mortensen is a charged man. The blue-eyed automaton, who for three weeks has occupied a cell charged with the murder of his friend and neighbor, James R. Hay, and who has remained cheerful, even happy, through the ordeal, has now undergone a transition so complete as to startle his jailers. The change came Wednesday night when his wife shattered his hopes by failing to present herself at the jail.

Yesterday when Sheriff Naylor and the jailers visited the prisoner they realized for the first time what a shock her failure to keep her appointment had proven to Mortensen. Until that hour he had refused to believe the stories that reached his ears to the effect that his wife was through with him forever because of belief that he lured young Hay down the railroad tracks at Forest Dale to his death on the fatal night of Dec. 16.

The man who could smile and joke, enjoy magazines and busy himself over commonplace accounts with apparently no thought of the terrible charge hanging over him found no pleasure in those diversions yesterday. Pale, haggard and hopeless, with a far away look in his eyes, he frigidly confronted those he has been wont to meet with expressions of welcome.

Sheriff Naylor spoke to him kindly, but he turned away. Jailers have visited his cell and found him stretched full length on his cot, lying on his face as in his habit. Mortensen was awake, but uncommunicative. Burying his face in the pillows he paid no further attention to his visitors. To one and all it was apparent that he had just awakened to a full realization of what the attitude of his wife meant to him.

Nothing was heard from Mrs. Mortensen as to whether she would visit the accused man at the jail later. Neither has anything been heard from Mortensen's father, who was expected to arrive long ago from Oakland, Cal.

Abandoned by All.

Mrs. Mortensen has not seen her husband since the day he was arrested, and so far as is known has not been in communication with him. Mortensen's attitude was that of being abandoned by the world—and it is little wonder that his wife, father-in-law, brothers-in-law, his closest friends and even his own father giving him a wide berth in his hour of trouble.

Two relatives and two only have shown a disposition to pin faith in him, his brother Henry and the latter's wife. And as they were not with him yesterday there was nothing to relieve the mental distress he has undergone, thought of being abandoned by all the world as a creature to be shunned.

The authorities feel that Mortensen still has the reserve force to pull himself together and shake off the gloom that hangs over him like a pall. Otherwise he will break down physically.

HOW A MAN FROM POCATELLO LANDED
WIFE AT AN EMPLOYMENT AGENCY

A pretty young woman with rosy cheeks and coquettish eyes, a good looking old man with a full purse and matrimonial desires, and a hustling agent formed the dramatic personae, and the office of a Salt Lake employment bureau served as the unromantic scene of a novel romance, a few days since, that has undoubtedly now reached its happy finale amid the merry chimes of wedding bells. It is the story of a Pocatello landlord and how he converted an employment bureau into a matrimonial agency.

Finding that single blessedness was not just what the poet has pictured it, the elderly landlord, whose name adorns the front door of a Pocatello inn, fell a victim to the tender passion and straightway journeyed to Zion in search of a "better half." With the bashfulness of a school boy about to recite "Mary Had a Little Lamb" on "speaking" Friday, the old gentleman appeared at the Salt Lake Employment agency and informed the clerk he wanted a good housekeeper. He was introduced to several applicants who presented the best of references, but the landlord shook his head. The same performance was repeated at other employment agencies, and with a look of deep disappointment on his face, the landlord appeared again at the first office.

"Now, just tell us what kind of a housekeeper you want and I assure we can get you one," said the clerk in his most persuasive tones.

"Well—er—I—well, I want a wife," stammered the landlord, with a blush that caused the clerk to look at him like a six nickel.

"You come back up this afternoon," said the clerk, with a reassuring smile. When the landlord arrived the young lady was there, and she took place in the story books. Suffice it to say that the Pocatello citizen, after a quiet conference with the young woman, reappeared with a broad smile on his countenance, and handing a tip to the clerk, whispered in stage tones, "It's all right; she's going to be my wife when we get back to Pocatello," and the two went away happy as larks.

They left on the 10:30 train that evening for Pocatello. The employment agency is now contemplating hanging out a sign, "Wives Furnished. No Extra Charge."

DOG LEADS LOST DOCTOR OUT OF FOG
AND LIFE OF A PATIENT IS SAVED

Had it not been for the unerring instincts of a faithful dog, daylight yesterday morning would probably have found Dr. W. F. Beer hopelessly lost on the fog-enveloped bench between Mt. Olivet and Emigration canyon, and the life of a dangerously ill patient whom he had been called to save would undoubtedly have been sacrificed.

The doctor, after wandering around for more than two hours, was finally led by his dog back to Mt. Olivet cemetery, where he secured a guide and reached his patient in time to save his life.

The patient who is convinced that he owes his life to the intelligent canine is Ernest Knystner, an employee at a Wagner brewery in Emigration canyon. About 8 o'clock Wednesday evening Knystner was seized with sudden and violent attack of appendicitis, and it was feared that he would die before medical aid could arrive.

He was summoned by phone and started immediately in his buggy. He had gotten but a short distance beyond Mount Olivet cemetery when he discovered that in the dense black fog he had lost his way.

"The fog was so dense," said the doctor, "that I could not see my horse's head, so I said nothing of the road. I tied a lantern which I had to the horse's head and tried to drive on, but it only made the blackness blacker. I drove and drove, but the further I went the more evident it became that I was lost.

"After wandering around in this manner for more than two hours, I finally gave up and decided to try to go in the opposite direction, so tying the lines to the horse's head, I got into the buggy and allowed the horse to follow the dog. I don't know how far he went, but after going through ditches and over ridges I suddenly brought up at Mount Olivet cemetery.

I got the sexton up and he tried to show me the road with a lantern, but we actually got lost from each other when we were not more than 200 or 300 feet apart. We could not see each other's lights and had to call to each other to find ourselves. I finally telephoned to the brewery and a guide came and took me to the place in time to save my patient, who would undoubtedly have died had I not gotten to him before morning.

"I've seen some fogs," said the doctor, "but I never saw anything like that last night."

Yesterday Knystner was brought in to the Holy Cross hospital and an operation was performed. Last night he was getting along nicely and he is expected to recover.

Lucy Gates Charms Great Audience in Salt Lake Theatre

If Emma Lucy Gates should mount the same pedestal of fame upon which stood the Patis and the Linds—and that is the earnest, sincere hope of her friends—she will still have cause to remember with gratification that magnificent reception of last night. Never in its history, perhaps, has the Salt Lake theatre held so representative an audience, and certainly seated Zion was never more completely swept away by a local product of genius.

Before the noon hour yesterday, there was but standing room in the house. A corps of attaches set about arranging chairs in the space usually occupied by the orchestra and in the aisles, and when these were sold, there was a veritable clamor for admission tickets, for fear the box office would be forced to stop selling.

Then came the event itself. To Miss Gates it was no less important than the realization of a life's dream. To the observer it was the profound, stupendous outpouring of a community's admiration, an unprecedented example of public pride and appreciation. All the musicians were there. Fashion attended in a body. The governor of the state led in the uproarious enthusiasm and stately adoration. The bankers and men of affairs, who never cared for concerts before, cast aside dignity and joined in the tumult.

The singer was not heard at her best. The applause was so loud that of so many strangers and friends must have been embarrassing, even terrifying. But after the first tremor of excitement, following her appearance upon the stage, she quickly on to a Chaminade number wherein her tones seemed less harsh—a fair indication of returning confidence—and, after rendering Eckert's Swiss echo song, then, in a low, sweet, and tender voice, she sang completely in her power. The Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," with violin obligato by Mr. Weihe and piano and organ accompaniment, was an achievement not soon to be forgotten. The house seemed at this juncture to be clutching its breath, and the air was rendered a trio of flower songs, the last of them being "His Favorite Flower," by Lowitz.

She was a dainty little miss, and he was very tall. And they gathered all the flowers that grew by the garden wall. "Don't you prefer the pink?" "Perhaps you like the hollyhock; you're just like them," said the singer. "I'd try and raise a few." "My favorite flower this moment I can see," said the singer.

The outburst that followed, brought on by the artful trick of a wink and a nod, was a masterpiece of timing. It ended. It seemed as if the climax of the evening had been reached. But just after this, the orchestra—a superb orchestra it was, too—played the overture of "Cavalleria Rusticana," and the first sonorous notes of the "Intermezzo" swept across the footlights. Miss Gates stepped out from the wings and sang the "Ave Maria" heard to that glorious melody.

Not a person in the house heard it through unmoved. Gaze of bird song, the final number, brought forth such an ovation that Miss Gates, after repeated acknowledgments, was compelled to respond with one more song—"Comin' Thro' the Rye," playing her organ accompaniment. During the evening about a bushel of flowers went over the footlights.

Besides the star of the evening, the orchestra was a distinct success. Mr. Weihe is to be complimented for having trained the thirty musicians so perfectly in so short a time and the town is to be congratulated on its ability to produce orchestral talent.

Polish shares conspicuously in the honors of the evening, first, for his fine orchestrations of the song numbers, and for his accompaniment.

Summing up the whole, it was an evening of music such as this city has seldom listened to.

Thousands of others have this same opportunity if you will but accept it.
